

Aaron Spectre Lost Tracks

The American Aaron Spectre turns out on his debut album as a little surprise bag. His last Drumcorps album still popped out of the speakers like a slap. But "Lost Tracks" goes in a completely different direction. There's nothing more to hear from Grindcore, Ragga Jungle or Breackcore. The album shows Aaron's gentle side. Ambient and chillout are terms that fit on "lost tracks". More specifically, it is quiet, melodic, electronic music. The six years it took for the nine tracks to be together show that these are not all that commonplace sites for Aaron Spectre. Especially the wonderful opener "Dulcimer" astonishes, because this idyllic and atmospheric feeling would not be suspected when listening to drum corps to Mr. Spectre.

"Lost Tracks" is not just an album of downtempo songs. Already the collaborations with Lapsed, Aarktica and Kazumi bring in new aspects. Be it Trip-Hop-like attitudes like the remix of "Break Ya Neck" by Lapsed or atmospheric electro pop on Aarktica's "Ocean". Back in the direction of trip-hop, the beautiful "Degrees", which cleverly works with broken beats and pauses, stands in contrast to Kazumi's female-sensual vocals and the guitar playing of Jon Derosa.

But Aaron Spectre also presents his grim pages. The melancholy "Half Silver" can not really be described as dark, but sounds in the dim light with its repetitive, simple melody, the voice samples and the rhythm clicking to itself. With repetitions, Aaron Spectre plays very often, but they form the backbone of most songs. Even the really dark, hip-hop-like "Down In The Gutter" builds on it. Walking along the repeats, the songs perform pirouettes and experience little transformations in their music.

On "Lost Tracks," Aaron Spectre once again shows his musical talent, albeit the meek.
